

At the Birdshot Day on 17th November 2018 we will be running an informal lunchtime discussion, chaired by Mr Richard Lee (NIHR Moorfields Biomedical Research Centre)

Do you have questions about how research is conducted and why it takes so long? Do you have questions about birdshot that you would like to raise in a group discussion?

This lunchtime session from 1.00pm offers an opportunity for an informal group discussion between fellow birdshotters and healthcare professionals. Please drop by and take part if you have any comments or questions that are appropriate for open discussion.

If you would like to suggest a topic or question in advance of the day, please email k.bonstein@nhs.net

Pictured above is the Patient and Public Involvement Team at the National Institute for Health Research (NIHR) Moorfields Biomedical Research Centre. They are a group of enthusiastic volunteers, staff and patients who bring many different skills and perspectives to the development of initiatives that help patients to influence research. They contributed to the Priority Setting Partnership for Sight Loss and Vision (through the steering group and data analysis) and now use those outcomes to begin debates between clinical researchers and the public when designing new projects. They also seek novel ways to communicate science.
